Not illustrated.1887 Excerpt: ... instances, there is no doubt that the vast majority of the men in our profession lay themselves out for general practice, or, to quote a phrase seen sometimes in advertisements, "Dentistry in all its branches." Although it may seem very respectable and refined (especially from their own point of view) for a few men to speak of the operating room as the only sphere worthy of their presence and attention, yet the fact remains that, speaking generally, the man who is not a good mechanic will not be a good or successful dentist. The powers that be, recognizing this fact, have in their wisdom required that the first part of the dental curriculum shall be a three years' apprenticeship to mechanical dentistry. In no profession is the demand greater for versatility, for readiness of adaptation to any and every circumstance that may arise, than in our own. A man should be equally at home with the engine or the lathe, the forceps or the blowpipe, filling teeth or mounting them, conserving the mouth or supplying its deficiencies. The man who is not able to perform every detail of work, whether in surgery or workshop, for himself, will never be able, should he ever get the opportunity, to direct assistants in their work for him, or to decide whether the work is or is not properly performed. Such a man would be scarcely likely either to make or maintain a successful practice. Be a man ever so good an operator, yet if he have not the tact or skill to make a good fit or a suitable match, his reputation is likely to be of very slow growth and his connection correspondingly small; while a poor or indifferent operator (that is, in the matter of saving teeth) will, in many cases, if he be clever and skilful in the adaptation of artificial teeth, rapidly make a large and remun...
