As a child I never stopped dreaming of brighter tomorrows, believing there was something out there I can do to make life better. I did what many kids of my background could never do. I fought my way to the top, became a trendsetter of New York's social scene, a Renaissance man during America's rebirth of the early '70s, an actor of film, television, and stage, now a writer. Being homeless at 44, after all I've accomplished, was a life shattering experience. "The Longhaired Boxer" is the triumph of rising, falling, and RISING AGAIN. The reading public loves a story in which a person stays in the fight for human dignity. It's through the lessons of others that we learn about ourselves and realize we're a lot alike and more resilient than we give ourselves credit. It's a true human story of challenge and dignity against fate's hardest tests. My mind elevated and spirit soared, and so would the reader after reading "The Longhaired Boxer."
